The Schools.

Commencement season marks the high water mark of interest in the schools. At such times the older boys and girls turn with enthusiasm to witness the doings of their children. The end work of school life is finished, scholars have been won, the victory is now to wear their laurels. The qualifying exercises do not, of course, demonstrate the truth of the words "praise in the diplomas, but they add to the world as proof of an honorable record, and the world is content that the heroes shall have their titles commencements are subject to change. The old method of passing the day with long and numerous orations, flowers and general displays of sympathetic audiences, is perhaps seen its best times. Orations now are not so numerous or so long, and occasionally as at Columbia College this year, are omitted altogether. Here an address by President Low took the place of the time-honored oration. —Perhaps the boys will be as well off as learners a while longer. The world still follows its old leaders, unimpaired, of the new lessons in the field.

But these are bound to make their mark in the near future. Mr. Andrew Carnegie, in a recent article in the New York Tribune, while encouraging a boy to work earnestly at his tasks, because there is abundance of room for success, speaks somewhat significantly of the usefulness of a College education.

It is much the fashion among the successful tollers in the shop and warehouse to decry the waste of years spent study. Yet in proportion to numbers, College graduates have succeeded well in money-making pursuits. As students and professionals they make commanding mark. Their numbers are increasing in the community, and they are everywhere influential.

The Commercial schools are, however, in increasing numbers, advancing the standard of intelligence in the community, and are somewhat successful.

It is to be a graduate of a public school no longer to attract unfavorable remark as though one were a pauper, or associate of the democracy. The plain people are the ruling force in America.

The distinctions and religious divisions are blotted out through the influence of association in public schools.
